JAY'S MANUAL OF FASHION, 1861.

THE APOLOGY.

MESSRS. JAY entertain a sincere conviction that their MANUAL OF FASHION is deemed more worthy of consideration than similar works; or those enunciated by the various trades in the commercial community. And though the main and developed object is to attract customers to view their classical collection of taste, yet a further inducement is to satisfy the frequent applications made for the illustration and detail, in connection with Novelties which give a tone to the season.

For some years past the Firm has issued, during the autumnal period, a publication illustrative of their MANTLES; which publication has been transmitted to their customers, and generally to all respectable classes. This issue, though attended with a large outlay, has hitherto been met by a corresponding increase of business in every department. Hence the reason for a continual issue of the MANUAL OF FASHION now becomes almost a case of imperative necessity, arising out of an increased trade; not only in this country, but to a very large extent throughout our Colonies, America, and India. With a view to render the designs as faultless as possible, the drawings are actual copies from Mantles and Dresses purchased in Paris, and selected from among the most distingués of the season; and such selections, be it observed, have been invariably recognised as the best comments on the taste of the day, independent of that depreciating remark, too often made by the French with respect to the novelty of English Fashions, "that they march twelve months in the rear of the Parisians." This cannot apply to the MANUAL, which delineates French fashion up to the time of publication; that is to say, "au moment même."

The names or titles of Mantles and Dresses are invariably of Parisian origin, and derived from local and other associations.

In the final paragraph of this Apology for the intrusion of their MANUAL, Messrs. JAY, with much deference, would observe, that although their object has been to cater for the highest class of customers, there is also kept a stock of goods suited to the wants of persons in any position in society; also Household Mourning for Servants is to be had, by reason of the quantity of business done, at a lower rate than by any other Firm in London.
